Having Decided to close

People who have not lived in India usually tell, as Sir G. L. Moleworth told the members of the Institution of Civil Engineers in his Presidential Address recently, to realise its magnitude and importance. With an area and population not much less than the half of Europe, it has enormous natural wealth and resources; agricultural, mineral, or industrial; great coalfields, rich metalliferous and other mineral deposits, abundant cereals, and various botanical products. It is waiting only for further development. In one respect its resources are inexhaustible, for its great rivers afford an unfailing source of electrical power; and in a future not, perhaps, so remote as we think, factories will gravitate to the neighbourhood of its streams. Little has at present been done in setting the rivers to work, for the time has not yet come; but they might be called now, as in the past, the heart's blood of India. Over a large part of that vast territory the rainfall is uncertain, and agriculture must be dependent on irrigation. This alone can avert the famines which, since history began, have been the scourge of Hindustan. Its rivers, both in Ceylon and in India, recognised the fact at a very early period. The irrigation works in the island, some of which were made long before the Christian Era, are on a grand scale, and show remarkable skill. In India, reservoirs and canals, hardly less remarkable, were constructed in various parts, especially under the Mogul Emperor. With the decline of their power the works began to go out of repair, and are now in many places useless. In both countries we have of late, and for the longer time in India, taken the matter seriously in hand, so that in the near future the natives will be at least as well off as they were three or four centuries ago. On the mainland about forty-four million acres are now irrigated. One fact which the President mentioned needs no comment. The Grand Anicut, a dam across the river Cauvery, was constructed in the second century. In 1836 it was restored by Sir Arthur Cotton at the cost of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, and it now brings the Government an annual revenue of sixty-six thousand pounds. But agricultural products, like minerals and manufactures, are only locally valuable, in the absence of means of transport. Thirty-five years ago, during the famine in Orissa, there was no lack of grain in other districts but it could not be conveyed into the distressed areas. So, though a million and a-half sterling was expended on relief works, one million persons—one fourth of the whole population of the province—perished from starvation. Railways practically began in 1853, the date of Lord Dalhousie's far-sighted Minute on railway policy, in which he set forth the great system of trunk lines which was afterwards carried out through the agency of Companies, and a guarantee of the State. Sir G. L. Moleworth traces the development of this policy, but into this we must not follow him. Enough to say that mistakes have been made, some of them grave. The break of gauge, though its inconveniences were amply demonstrated in England, has been permitted to establish itself there, and more than one system of management exists. Railways at first were constructed and managed by the State; then (in 1870) the Government undertook the control of all new lines; and lastly came State ownership or railways managed by Companies, which involves, as we might expect, "all the evils of dual control and divided responsibility." But goods, supplies, and troops can now be moved with comparative ease through the length and breadth of the Peninsula, a matter of the highest importance in fighting famine or rebellion at home, or invasion from without. The construction of railways, however, sometimes presents great local difficulties in India. Its rivers are potential foes as well as friends: their vast size, erode power, silt-bearing capacity, and habits of wandering make them difficult to bridge and to restrain within due bounds.

A ship's doctor who has made 100 voyages declares that the American girl does not become sea-sick so readily as her European sisters. The English girl is next in order of resistance, while the French girl vomits almost easily.
